

MONDAY, 12th February 1923.

GEORGE MACDONALD, C.B., F.B.A., D.LITT., LL.D., in the Chair.

Before proceeding with the ordinary business of the Meeting, Dr Macdonald made the following reference to the recent death of Mr Robert Scott-Moncrieff:—

“The passing of a figure that has long been familiar at our gatherings is always a melancholy experience for those of us who remain. It is doubly melancholy when the figure is associated with a personality so eminently lovable as that of Robert Scott-Moncrieff. He was singularly unassuming; but, despite his modesty, he was known to a wide circle as a useful citizen, and within the narrower limits of his own profession he enjoyed a popularity that must have been almost unique. In everything he did for the Society—and he served it well and faithfully as Secretary for fourteen years—his diligence in business, his unruffled geniality, his ready helpfulness were conspicuous. Since he joined us in 1907 he has rarely been absent from a meeting. Unfortunately, the everyday demands upon his time made it impossible for him to contribute to the Proceedings as frequently as we could have wished. But such papers as he did publish had a value and a flavour of their own. Who else would have thought of writing upon the early use of Aqua Vitæ in Scotland? And who else could have done it with the same happy combination of the serious and the playful? That was characteristic. If the ages of stone and bronze found little favour in his eyes, he had a genuine love of all that related to the story of his country, and was exceptionally conversant with the lore and customs of bygone days. Witness the edition of the Household Book of Lady Grisell Baillie, which he prepared for the Scottish History Society. Socially he had many gifts. He could sing an old song with real feeling, and, when the mood was upon him, he could touch off the foibles of his antiquarian acquaintances in light verse with a deftness that few could equal. To those of us who were privileged to know him more intimately, his removal brings a keen sense of deprivation. It will be long before we forget the bright and cheery companion, whose conversation was coloured by a delightful sense of humour, and constantly lit up by flashes of a wit that was never other than good-natured; the loyal friend, whom sheer kindness of heart compelled to give ungrudgingly of his best whenever advice or assistance was asked.”

Dr Macdonald moved, and it was agreed, that the Society record their great regret at the loss sustained through the death of Mr Scott-Moncrieff and express their deepest sympathy with his family, and that the Secretary be instructed to forward an excerpt of this minute to his daughter. The Meeting signified approval by standing up.
